MIAMI (WSVN) -- After surveying hundreds of people in Liberty City, Miami officials are hoping to ease tension in its "Liberty City Rising" redevelopment plan.

The Liberty Square Resident Council completed a door-to-door campaign to get input on the proposed project and its process.

At a prayer meeting, Tuesday morning, residents and a host of community partners arrived with the excitement to endorse and support the Related Urban Development Plan for Liberty Square Rising.

Alberto Milo, the Senior Vice President and Principal of Related Urban Development said, "Part of our plan is to address public safety, to address housing and to address healthcare and education because we know that those are the pillars that will help this community thrive in the long term."

According to city officials, they hope this process will give residents of Liberty Square, one of the oldest neighborhoods in Miami, the quality of life they deserve.
